Wild Parsnip/Hogweed

Please take care outdoors this summer to avoid Giant Hogweed and its cousin, Wild Parsnip. Skin contact can cause rather nasty burns. Giant Hogweed should be avoided at all costs. Wild Parsnip should be destroyed at root level.

The following is a link to the DEC identification page for Hogweed, and includes photos of Wild Parsnip as well. They look like oversized Queen Anne's Lace. Giant Hogweed grows to 14 feet in height, so it's usually easy to avoid, but Wild Parsnip grows to 5 feet and looks like a pretty wildflower.

Wild Parsnip causes burns on contact with the sap. Washing your skin doesn't fully rid you of the chemical, and UV exposure causes additional burning (phytophotodermatitis). Sunscreen is a must. The burns can include blisters. You may notice that any sun contact causes a burning sensation.

It appears to be everywhere and is flowering right now. It's on campus, along routes 21 and 244 at the roadside and in fields. Please take care outdoors as the plants may be damaged or crushed and leaking sap.
